Success in addressing transnational organized crime hinges on multilateral cooperation. However, existing cooperation regimes need to adapt to keep up with rapid changes in the organized crime landscape, and countries are increasingly turning to national solutions. How well equipped are these regimes to respond to these challenges, and how can they adapt?

GI-TOC published a report authored by Yvon Dandurand and Jessica Jahn to address these issues, which contains an analysis of five possible scenarios for the future of international cooperation against transnational organized crime.

This webinar, will hear presentations from the report's authors, and will include discussion with leading multilateral cooperation officials and experts.
